Boncuk and the Quiet Invitation

Boncuk brought a big ball to the garden. Friends ran across the grass. Ece, a rabbit, sat by the fence with a book. Boncuk waved. “Come and play!” the puppy called. Ece smiled but stayed on the bench.

Boncuk and the Quiet Invitation

Boncuk called again. “I do not want to run right now,” Ece said. The puppy was surprised. The ball game seemed so exciting. Boncuk went to Mum and asked why the friend would not join.

Boncuk and the Quiet Invitation

“What did Ece tell you?” Mum asked. Boncuk thought. “That running did not feel right now.” The puppy remembered tired days too. Perhaps friends did not need to choose the same game at the same time.

Boncuk and the Quiet Invitation

Boncuk returned to the bench. “May I sit here for a while?” Ece moved over. The book showed leaves of different shapes. Boncuk pointed to a fallen leaf. “Shall we find one like that?” the puppy asked.

Boncuk and the Quiet Invitation

They gathered fallen leaves and arranged them on a cloth. Ece chose a pointed leaf; Boncuk chose a round one. The ball players came to look. Some joined them, while others stayed with the ball.

Boncuk and the Quiet Invitation

On the way home, Boncuk told Mum about two lovely games. “Listening to Ece helped us find a new one,” the puppy said. Tomorrow Boncuk would bring both the ball and the cloth, so friends could choose.

Boncuk and the Turn to Choose

Boncuk invited Ece and Can to the garden. The puppy wanted to build a tower. Ece suggested a toy picnic. Can wanted a treasure hunt. Everyone described a favorite idea, but the visit could not quite begin.

Boncuk and the Turn to Choose

“My game first,” Boncuk said. Can frowned, and Ece folded the picnic cloth. Boncuk noticed the silence and looked at Dad. “Have we heard all three ideas?” Dad asked gently.

Boncuk and the Turn to Choose

Taking turns helped them discover that each game could be small. A tower needed only a few blocks. Picnic toys could visit the tower. For a treasure hunt, three colorful paper shapes would be enough.

Boncuk and the Turn to Choose

Together they chose where to begin. Can built, Boncuk carried blocks, and Ece made spaces for toys. When the tower fell, they paused and rebuilt. The wider tower now held a little piece of everyone's idea.

Boncuk and the Turn to Choose

Next Ece began the picnic. Boncuk brought a toy, and Can straightened the cloth. During the treasure hunt, Boncuk hid the shapes. When friends needed help, the puppy gave clues about nearby colors.

Boncuk and the Turn to Choose

“Our three games joined together,” Can said at the end. Boncuk suggested that Ece choose the beginning next time. Ece smiled. Plans could change; what mattered was making space to hear everyone.

How could you listen when a friend wants a different game?

How would you like to share choices in a group game?
